“ To most people he was Walt. But to me he was my Uncle Junior, and he was definitely one of the most influential people in my life. He was very patient, caring, loving, and understanding, and I have spent my life using him as a role model to try and live with those same qualities. My children seem to have inherited those traits as well, and I can see them instilling them in their children. So these Uncle Junior qualities seem destined to live on for generations to come. We'll miss him, but I know he'll continue to be a big influence in our lives.

Walter was always Junior to me... my uncle who was often like a second big brother to me. He taught me a lot about so many things while growing up. By example, he taught me to be more understanding and accepting differences. These lessons were very important, especially when dealing with parents. At the same time, he taught me about setting personal boundaries. Not with bluster, but with legitimate pride and respect for self and other. I have many fond memories of sharing oranges in tin pie pans with Junior and my brother David. I can still see the blue flame of the gas heater in his bedroom while we thoroughly enjoyed each other's juvenal humor and nonsense. These are some of my favorite memories.
